

As the first news about the most recent in a long-line of American crimes against the Islamic nation was published, some Muslims expressed their outrage and shock. The despicable event which took place is the rape of at least two Algerian Muslim women by the Station Chief of the CIA in Algiers.

In reality, that such an incident could take place in the heart of a Muslim homeland, in spite of its proud history and vast deposits of natural resources should come as a surprise to no one. As the story developed it has emerged that the man in question, 41 year old Andrew Warren, has filmed himself raping at least 12 Muslim women¹, in a crime spree which stretches back over many years, and involved women in at least one other Muslim country (Egypt) besides Algeria. Warren has also spent time in Afghanistan.

For decades the enemies of Islam have collectively sought to seize the chastity of our women and children. Sexual assault has become a weapon of war, deployed as often as needed by the transgressors against the Muslims. In Bosnia, towns such as Foca became as infamous for the rape of Muslim women and girls as Srebrenica became for the murder of Muslim men and boys. There were Serbian soldiers whose only occupation was to rape. They never went out on patrol, the never stood watch at night, they never fired a shot from their rifle, and their only task each day was to rape Muslim women whenever possible.²

Using rape as a strategy effects a broad range of people. Foremost this contemptuous tactic humiliates the women and children who are the principle victims. Secondly this tactic makes the male population feel complicit and guilty, as they were incapable of preventing the crimes from occurring. If the enemies of Islam fail to capture a Mujahid, often their retaliation is the rape of his wife, his sister, his daughter or his mother, in a vain attempt to break his will.

As with the crimes of the occupiers in Abu Ghraib, these sex attacks are not merely manifestations of the perversions of individual occupiers. Rather they are actually part of a broader plan to weaken the resolve of the Muslims, to divide them and to sow the seeds of despair and disunity amongst them. These plans were hatched by the upper echelons of every army to battle the Muslims since the fall of the Khilafah, from the Serbians to the Russians, and most recently the Americans and Ethiopians. The theory seems to be that if they cannot militarily defeat the Mujahideen, and their spirit refuses to be broken, then the enemy will turn on the apparent

'weakest link' in the society, the women and children.

In this case there has been a disturbing trend to blame the victims. While there is some evidence that the two Algerian women may have willingly drunk alcohol, does this mean that they can legitimately be sexually assaulted? And what about the ten other women who were assaulted and filmed by Warren? How do we know that they also drank alcohol? Warren could have easily spiked tea or coffee with Xanax, and later assaulted the women.

The real criminal in this case is plain to see. The sad fact is that to this date, Andrew Warren has not been dismissed by the CIA. Having escaped Islamic justice, he will now most likely not face any serious legal consequences in America.

POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS:

When we look closely at the case, we can see four clear lessons for the Muslims:

1) The obedient servant is well-rewarded:

In September of last year, when the women finally came forward to report what had occurred, Warren was not arrested, but instead in October he was put on a plane and sent back to Washington, before the scandal became widely publicised. This was partly to protect him from the Mujahideen and the anger of the Algerian masses, but it also served to guarantee that the obedient American servant President 'Abd al-'Aziz Bouteflika would not have to face any 'dilemma' over what to do with Warren. As a result of his obedience shown by handing over the hypocrite to the Americans where he could not face Islamic justice, Bouteflika was rewarded by being permitted to ram an important bill through the Algerian Parliament in November. This bill altered the Algerian Constitution so that Bouteflika will now be allowed to run for a third term in office in the April 9th elections.³

Had Bouteflika displayed an ounce of courage and demanded Warren to stand trial in Algeria, you can bet the State Department would be heading up an international chorus of condemnation for this power-grab. Bouteflika would be facing an avalanche of pressure to resign.

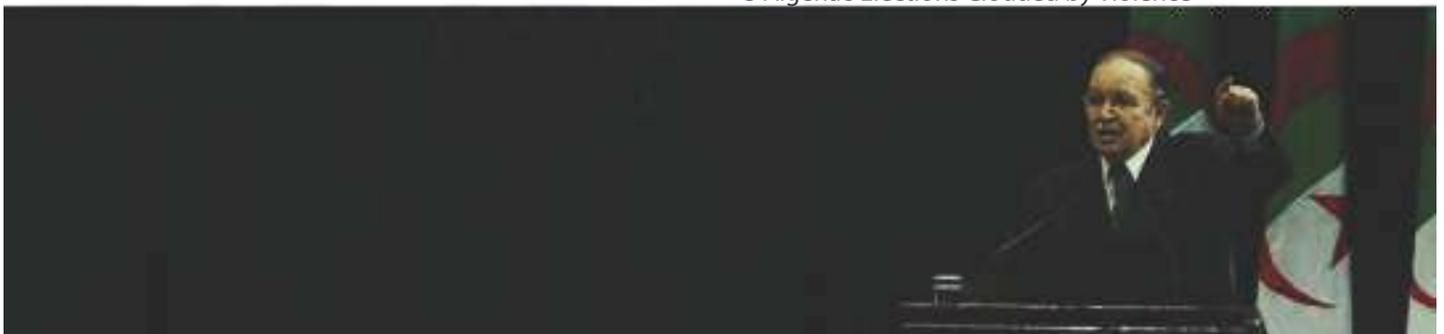

It is interesting to compare how much criticism Hugo Chavez faced for making almost exactly the same Constitutional change at nearly the same time, and this is despite the fact that Chavez put his Constitutional change to the people in a referendum, whereas Bouteflika forced his change on the Algerian people.

In the same way, when the Egyptian authorities discovered Warren had raped numerous Egyptian Muslim women, he was quietly relocated to Algeria, and Egypt was able to avoid any unpleasantnesses with Washington.

2) Western embassies are used to spread corruption in Islamic lands

Both of the Algerian women who were raped met Warren at official US embassy functions, and were invited back to his private residence from there. The so-called embassies of Western nations in Muslim lands mainly serve as covers to spy on the Muslims and the Mujahideen. From these outposts, they organise the plundering of natural resources and the spreading of corruption throughout the land. Yet some Muslims still insist that they must not be targeted as doing so would violate a covenant between the Muslims and the kuffar!

³ Algeria's Elections Clouded by Violence

The covenant issue is an amazing point. All treaties which have signed between the Taghout governments and kuffar nations should be considered null and void, as the kuffar have broken the terms of the agreements on countless occasions. Therefore these covenants should not be binding upon the Muslims.

'Diplomats' and 'embassies' should likewise not be protected under any arrangement, as they are the principle transgressors against the Muslims in the lands in which they are established.

3) The US does not want democracy or the rule of law in Muslim countries

The rule of law has not existed in Algeria since 1992. That year is significant because on the verge of a massive election victory the Islamic Salvation Front (known by its French initials FIS) was brutally attacked by the secular army (no doubt with CIA backing). Who can forget the widespread atrocities which followed, when whole villages were murdered by government soldiers disguised as Mujahideen. It is little wonder that former FIS leader Abassi Madani has recently called for Algerians to boycott the polls⁴, as all opposition to Bouteflika has been ruthlessly suppressed in recent years.

The US is quite happy for secular tyrants to rule Islamic countries for decades, provided that they keep their Islamists suppressed. Their goal is simply to pacify the Middle East until its natural resources have been exploited to the point of exhaustion; what happens to the Muslim masses is irrelevant as long as they are kept in check.

HAMAS and their brethren can jump through as many hoops as the Zionists and Christians can think of, and it will all amount to nothing.

4) The Muslims must abandon nationalism once and for all

Al-Qaa'idah in the Land of the Islamic Maghreb has vowed to take revenge⁵ for the attack. It should be kept in mind that this is not just an 'Algerian' problem, and the responsibility for retaliating against the Americans cannot rest with them alone. The Ummah will get nowhere as long as we continue to view crusader oppression and injustice as localised problems.

The kuffar put together coalitions consisting of dozens of different nations to fight the Muslims of Afghanistan and then the Muslims of Iraq. The Muslims must also work together if they hope to repel these assaults.

A crime against any Muslim must be seen as a crime against every Muslim!
